Since the 1960s experiments Richter with the idea of creating works in which coincidence plays a crucial role. Even though Richter pre-determines parameters such as choice of colour and material, as well as format the result is only partially controllable.

Thus, Richter chooses first the colours and applies them onto a flat surface. Here he incorporates oil and lacquering paints in different ways. Additionally, he works with palette knife and other materials. Richter captures this partially random, partially planned swirling of the paint with all its details by making a status quo print. For this he lays the desired carrier, here a catalogue page, onto the paint and is thus the carrier for the snapshot, only the paint creating the forms. When taking off the carrier small gaps remain in the paint which allows insight onto the carrier. They partially overlap and partially bleed into each other's colour spaces and acts as indirect references for Richter's creation process. The viewer realises quickly that coincidence played an active part of the creation process. Therefore, Richter partially incorporates visual experience the creation process of his works.

Richter frees himself from the traditional dogma of painting with this unique technique. With almost half a century of artistic experience Richter demonstrates established viewing habits and is promoted to one of the most meaningful international artist of the century.
