Carabain knew how to read the stories of a city through its architecture and was able to transfer this content into his paintings. The present painting demonstrates the described abilities in an exemplary way. It shows numerous villagers on a market day on the Moselle in Cochem. The snapshot of normality is framed by the town church flashing up in the background. Carabain's painting also shows a characteristic feature of his personal style: a preference for depicting medieval and baroque towns. His city views are reminiscent; they recall the originality and simplicity of the medieval and baroque periods. They testify to a longing for the past times and yet the spirit of modernity speaks from them.
