The so-called "Stadthouderservice" was designed in Meissen 1772. Johann Joachim Kaendler notes in his working note in October that an "ovale Terine welchen Servic vor dem Stadt Halter nach Holland bestellet is Modelliret (sic!)" (engl. oval terrine that has been commissioned by the governor to Holland is modeled (sic!)).

With originally 435 pieces it was an exceptionally large commission whose decor showcases all of the manufacturer's craftsmanship: In the centres of each plate, there are subtly painted views of the Dutch provinces and their most beautiful view after the models of Dutch copper engravings - bearing witness to the eighty-year war between Spain and the Netherlands and expressing national pride of the united Netherlands and their unification.

The whole service has already been called twice in an auction - once in 1823 in only one lot, the second time divided into 75 lots. As a result, with the second auction in 1868, the service with its 435 pieces became scattered across the globe. Some pieces are now back in the Palais Het Loo in Apeldoorn and in the Rijksmuseum where they are accessible for visitors as Dutch heritage. Here special significance is placed on the provenance: "Willem V of Orange, Stadtholder of the United Provinces."
